As the frugality suffers, many people are interested in finding a new career. Sometimes this is a personal choice, and sometimes, like in the housing of people who have lost their jobs or have been laid off, it is a necessity. There are certain types of careers which flourish at times when the economy takes a turn for the worse. An occupation in the current economy is not one of those risks. If anything, an occupation in the current economy can be expected to increase in demand overtime, regardless of our economic situation. That is because the needs of the population are not necessarily driven by the status of the economy. As the population grows the need for highly trained and qualified health care workers continues to rise.

The Healthcare Job Outlook for 2008/2009 describes new health care employment from 2006 – 2016 as superior with over 3 million new health care jobs added for the period. As well, the projected salary increase is 22% compared to meet 11% for other industries combined.

The Department of Labor shows similar findings, projecting that health care jobs are expected to increase over 35% over the coming decade, which is much faster than the average for every occupation. The health care business is expanding as our population grows and ages, and as technology advances, so continues the need for highly trained health care workers such as a surgical support health care assistant, vocational nurse, computerized office assistant, and so on.

An occupation in the current economy has been referred to as “recession-proof.” Few industries can boast this kind of employment outlook. If you’ve been laid off in another work field, this should not be a concern for you in considering your future in a health care career. It is highly unusual for health care layoffs to occur.

And if you are considering an occupation in the health care field, even if you have no health care training, or even a GED, it is best to get started right away, in order to take advantage of this growing industry. Health care education courses are available for every type of lifestyle. You can receive assistance with training, employment placement assistance, and in some cases even financial aid. The occupation choices are nearly unlimited, from vocational nursing programs, to diagnostic health care sonographer training, to pharmacy technician careers, and so much more. Take your first step towards that new health care occupation today!
